III. Purpose of RFQ

Project background:

Public health evidence and current gaps in HCV testing, diagnosis, linkage, and treatment are similar to the gaps and needs for HIV diagnosis, linkage, and treatment. This is the basis for the operations research agenda proposed for an additional output and work area through HIV Self-Testing Africa (STAR), a Unitaid-funded initiative that currently operates in 13 countries and aims to catalyze the global market for HIVST, generate evidence, and create an enabling environment for scale-up. Through the HIV Self-Testing Africa consortium, PATH will conduct implementation research to assess different HCVST delivery models in two HIV Self-Testing Africa countries—India and Vietnam—which have high HCV disease burden and diagnostic gaps among KPs and PLHIV.

In Vietnam, this research study aims to evaluate the relative effectiveness of three types of HCVST models in reaching first time HCV testers as compared to routine provider-led testing among KP, PLHIV, and their sexual and/or injecting partners, in order to support attainment of the country’s viral hepatitis elimination goals and inform key national and global guidelines and best practices for HCVST and HCV service delivery. The study involves the use of HCV self-tests which are not currently authorized/licensed in the country. Clients who have positive HCVST results will be referred to other sites for further confirmatory testing and treatment services where clients receive HCV treatment medications purchased from this study.
